

“Diverse” is an appropriate description for the range of Garfield County’s cultural amenities, as it spans six municipalities and several geographic regions, each with their own identities and influences. While much of the county proudly retains a rural and western culture that harkens back to its farming and ranching roots, gradual urbanization is altering the cultural landscape. This is being accompanied by an influx of modern telecommunications, performing arts centers, and urban transplants seeking rural lifestyles.

As just a flavor of the diversity offered to residents and visitors to the county performing arts are drawing larger audiences throughout the county with performance centers like Thunder River Theater Company in Carbondale, the New Space Theater at the CMC Spring Valley campus, and the recently renovated New Ute Theater in Rifle. The many world-class cultural offerings in Aspen and Vail are easily accessible from most areas of the county. These venues provide community and professional theater, programs on literature, politics, visual arts, and a variety of public educational, civic and cultural activities. Colorado Mountain College provides multiple cultural opportunities to students and the public at its various campuses within Garfield County.

Each community within the county has a variety of cultural amenity offerings that range from film to rodeo, and from fairs to historic walking tours. This section highlights only a few of the unique and signature events that help give each community its unique flavor and feel.
